Note: States (including some without and some with subsidized employment programs) also are using TANF Emergency Funds to cover the costs of short-term non-recurrent work supports for low-income working families. For example, several states are using TANF Emergency Funds for the increased costs of providing a refundable earned income tax credit to working families with children.

States in bold have federally approved applications for operating subsidized employment programs; non-bolded states are planning programs.

These data were collected from state TANF staff by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, the Center for Law and Social Policy, and the National Transitional Jobs Network between January 28, 2010 and May 17, 2010.
